20 One-Liners to Remember

Quick-fire facts for last-minute revision.

- 1 Lien in banking law is the legal right to retain goods or securities until a lawful debt is cleared.
Lien allows holding possession but does not by itself allow sale of the goods.
- 2 Lien flows from the bailor-bailee relationship under the Indian Contract Act, 1872.
When goods are handed over for a lawful purpose, the receiver becomes a bailee with a right of retention.
- 3 Possession is essential for lien; there is no lien without possession.
If the holder does not physically hold the goods, no lien can arise.
- 4 Ownership of goods under lien stays with the original owner throughout.
Lien only gives a right of retention, not a transfer of ownership.
- 5 A particular lien exists when goods are retained only for dues arising from the same transaction.
It is tightly limited to one specific transaction and cannot cover unrelated debts.

6 A general lien allows retention of goods for any general balance due, not just one transaction.

It is broader than particular lien but reserved for certain categories of professionals.

7 Bankers, factors, wharfingers, policy brokers and High Court attorneys are entitled to general lien.

These categories of professionals are specifically recognised as holders of general lien.

8 General lien does not include the right to sell goods.

Even though its coverage is wider, the holder can only retain possession, not sell.

9 The banker's lien is treated by courts as an implied pledge.

This special status gives banks a right to sell securities that an ordinary lien holder does not have.

10 Under banker's lien, the bank can sell securities to recover its dues after reasonable notice.

This right to sell distinguishes banker's lien from particular and general lien.

11 As long as securities remain physically with the bank, banker's lien has no limitation period.

This differs from a normal loan recovery claim, which generally carries a three-year limitation period.

12 Banker's lien does not apply to safe custody articles kept only for safekeeping.

Items deposited purely for safekeeping fall outside the scope of banker's lien.

13 Banker's lien does not attach to securities deposited for a specific fixed purpose.

If the purpose of deposit is fixed, the general right of lien does not apply.

14 Banker's lien cannot arise on stolen goods or securities.

No valid lien can be created on property that is stolen.

15 The same-capacity rule requires the debtor and the owner of the goods to be the same person in the same capacity.

A bank cannot use one person's security to recover another person's debt.

16 Negative lien has no statutory definition and is purely a banking practice.

It exists only as a written undertaking given by the borrower to the bank.

17 Under negative lien, the borrower undertakes not to sell the asset or create a charge over it without the lender's consent.

This undertaking is a personal promise, not a transfer of possession or security.

18 Negative lien gives the bank no possession and no enforceable security interest over the asset.

It is a restriction on the borrower's actions, not a security in favour of the bank.

19 A pledge involves delivery of goods as security with an inherent right to sell on default.

This distinguishes a pledge from an ordinary lien, which only permits retention.

20 Lien in banking law is tested across JAIIB Legal and Regulatory Aspects of Banking and CAIIB.

It frequently appears as case-based questions rather than simple one-line definitions.
